Foreword

This booklet traces the origin and history of the European Council. It was produced as a supplement to the poster for the historical series (archives): ‘The European Council — an institution at the summit of the European Union’.

Taking as its starting point the first summit meeting in Paris in 1961, it describes how the European Council developed in terms of how it operates, its role and mandate, up to the point where it became a fully fledged institution with the 2009 Treaty of Lisbon.

There is a complete list of all meetings of the European Council and all summit meetings since 1961 at the end of this booklet.

The booklet is aimed at academics and researchers but also at everybody with a particular interest in the history of European integration.

Introduction

The Heads of State or Government of the six Member States of the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) met on 19 and 20 February 1957 in Paris, at the invitation of the President of the French Council of Ministers, Guy Mollet, to iron out the remaining problems with the drafting of the future Treaties of Rome.

After the Treaties of Rome came into force, the idea of meeting at the top level was put forward again by President Charles de Gaulle. He went on to host the first summit meeting of the Heads of State or Government of the six Member States of the European Communities in February 1961 in Paris.

In its 50 years of existence since that first summit of the Heads of State or Government of the Member States, the European Council has gradually developed from being an occasional event to its present status as an institution of the European Union. This anniversary spurs us to look back briefly over the history of this new institution, which from its beginnings has been at the centre of the major decisions taken by Member States about their integration. That story reflects that of the European Union as a whole: its policies and ambitions, its crises and progress.

Summit meetings

Held in Paris in February 1961, the purpose of the first summit was ‘to seek the methods by which closer political cooperation could be organised’ ⁽¹⁾. The fact that it was at the level of Heads of State or Government made it possible to address big issues not provided for by the Paris and Rome Treaties, such as certain aspects of relations with third countries.

At the July 1961 Bonn summit, the Six explored the idea of deeper political cooperation and declared that: ‘the Heads of State or Government [...] have decided [...] to hold at regular intervals meetings whose aim will be to compare their views, to concert their policies and to reach common positions in order to further the political union of Europe [...]’ ⁽²⁾.

However, during that period, developments towards a possible political union were faced with an unfavourable climate, marked in particular by the failure of the ‘Fouchet plans’ ⁽³⁾ of 1961 and 1962, the disagreements of 1963 and 1967 on the first enlargement and the ‘empty chair’ crisis of 1965 and 1966, when France did not participate in the meetings of the Council or of Council bodies.

In this climate, the Heads of State or Government stopped meeting until May 1967, when the Rome summit was the occasion for formal celebration of the 10th anniversary of the signing of the EEC and Euratom Treaties.

The summit at The Hague in December 1969, in which the Commission participated for the first time, saw the Community relaunched. The decisions taken at that summit opened the way to, among other things: the adoption of a decision that gave the Community its own financial resources; the launch of foreign policy cooperation (European political cooperation initiated by the first 'Davignon report'); and the accession of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom. These steps forward were known collectively as 'completion, deepening and enlargement'. The three new members were invited to take part in the summit held in Paris in October 1972, although their official accession took place only in January 1973.

The beginnings of the European Council

Following the Copenhagen summit (December 1973), which made provision for summits to be held whenever necessary, the Paris summit of December 1974, hosted by President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, created the European Council.

‘The need for an overall approach to the internal problems involved in achieving European unity and the external problems facing Europe’ ⁽⁴⁾ was the basis for its creation. Thus the role given to the European Council was to provide political impetus in the Community and in political cooperation. Accompanied by foreign ministers, the Heads of State or Government would meet thereafter ‘three times a year and whenever necessary’ ⁽⁵⁾.

The European Council met for the first time in March 1975 in Dublin.

Although the European Council did not have any legal basis in the treaties, its role in moving the European project forward was confirmed in the 1980s, when Europe faced blockages in relation to its budget and to the issue of agriculture. Thus, the Fontainebleau European Council of June 1984 succeeded in unblocking the situation, adopting a package of measures addressing those fields. In addition, it asked an ad hoc committee ⁽⁶⁾ to ‘make suggestions for the improvement of the operation of European cooperation in both the Community field and that of political [...] cooperation’ ⁽⁷⁾.

The Committee’s report was debated at the Milan European Council in June 1985, which decided by a majority to convene an Intergovernmental Conference (IGC) to revise the treaties, especially with regard to the way the Community institutions operated and to freedom of movement, and to draft a text on common foreign and security policy.

The European Council in the treaties

The Single European Act

The results of the IGC's work were the focus of discussions at the Luxembourg European Council of December 1985, which achieved a political agreement that opened the way for the adoption of the Single European Act. The Act, which came into force on 1 July 1987, combined in a single document some changes to the Community treaties and a text on cooperation in the area of foreign policy.

The Single European Act gave the European Council a legal treaty basis, enshrining its existence and defining its composition: 'The European Council shall bring together the Heads of State or of Government of the Member States and the President of the Commission of the European Communities. They shall be assisted by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs and by a Member of the Commission. The European Council shall meet at least twice a year.'

Although its powers are not defined in the Single European Act, the European Council continues to contribute to the most important developments in the construction of Europe.

So it was with the moves towards the creation of economic and monetary union, in which a decisive role was played by a number of European Councils such as that of Hanover in June 1988.

The Treaty of Maastricht

The Strasbourg European Council of December 1989 set the launch of an IGC on economic and monetary union for December 1990. It was followed by the Dublin European Council in April 1990, which launched the preparations for an IGC on political union. Both IGCs began in the margins of the Rome European Council in December 1990. The Maastricht European Council in December 1991 achieved an agreement on the new Treaty, which would cover both these fields in the same text.

The Maastricht Treaty, which was signed on 7 February 1992, came into force on 1 November 1993 and created the European Union, based on an enlarged Community pillar, covering among other things the creation of economic and monetary union, and two new pillars:

common foreign and security policy (CFSP) and cooperation in the fields of justice and home affairs (JHA).

In addition, the Treaty addressed the European Council's role in interinstitutional relations. It formalised the practice by which the European Council was presided over by the Head of State or Government of the country holding the Presidency of the Council. Furthermore, in keeping with the increase in the European Parliament's powers, the Treaty provided that the European Council must submit a report to the Parliament following each of its meetings and an annual written report on the progress made by the Union.

First European Council after the entry into force of the Single European Act, Copenhagen, 4–5 December 1987

Finally, the Maastricht Treaty began to clarify the powers of the European Council: 'The European Council shall provide the Union with the necessary impetus for its development and shall define the general political guidelines thereof.' The defining by the European Council of broad economic policy guidelines is an expression of this role.

The Amsterdam and Nice Treaties

After the Turin European Council of March 1996, which mandated the IGC to revise the Treaty, negotiations were given a new thrust by the special Dublin European Council of October of the same year. The outstanding issues were addressed at the Amsterdam European Council of June 1997. The Treaty could therefore be signed on 2 October 1997 and entered into force on 1 May 1999.

The Treaty of Amsterdam defined the European Council's powers in relation to the CFSP: 'The European Council shall define the principles of and general guidelines for the common foreign and security policy, including for matters with defence implications. [It] shall decide on common strategies to be implemented by the Union in areas where the Member States have important interests in common.' Note in this context the important role played in these areas by the European Councils of Pörtlach (informal meeting, October 1998), Cologne (June 1999) and Helsinki (December 1999).

After the Amsterdam Treaty came into force, the extraordinary European Council of Tampere in October 1999, devoted to the establishment of an 'area of freedom, security and justice in the European Union', decided to implement a 'common EU asylum and migration policy' and opened the way for significant progress in the area of police and judicial cooperation.

In March 2000, the extraordinary European Council of Lisbon put in place a strategy for improving the competitiveness of the European economy. With that objective, it provided among other things for the introduction of a new open method of coordination at all levels, 'coupled with a stronger guiding and coordination role for the European Council, to ensure more coherent strategic direction and effective monitoring of progress'. It was decided that every spring there would be a European Council meeting to follow up this subject.

From 1999, the European Council began a process of reform, with a view in particular to the enlargement of the Union. Thus, after debates on these subjects at the European Councils of Helsinki (December 1999), Gothenburg (June 2001) and Barcelona (March 2002), the Seville European Council of June 2002 gave 'its agreement to a series of specific measures applicable, without amendment of the treaties, to the organisation and functioning of the European Council [...] and of the Council' ⁽⁸⁾. These measures concerned the preparation, and conduct of and follow-up to the work of the European Council and its conclusions.

Declaration No 22 annexed to the Final Act of the Nice Treaty of 26 February 2001 provides that: 'As from 2002, one European Council meeting per Presidency will be held in Brussels. When the Union comprises 18 members, all European Council meetings will be held in Brussels.' The Treaty was concluded after four days of negotiations at the Nice European Council in December 2000 ⁽⁹⁾.

The Laeken declaration adopted by the European Council in December 2001 called for a Convention on the future of Europe to be convened. The draft 'constitutional treaty' submitted by the Convention to the President of the Council in July 2003 then formed the basis for the work of the IGC called in October 2003, and the Treaty was signed on 29 October 2004.

However, the Treaty's failure to achieve ratification in 2005 led the Heads of State or Government to adopt a declaration, at the June 2005 ⁽¹⁰⁾ European Council, during the Luxembourgish Presidency, inaugurating a one-year reflection period. Responding to the June 2006 European Council under the Austrian Presidency, the Berlin Declaration adopted by the Heads of State or Government on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the Treaty of Rome set the 'aim of placing the European Union on a renewed common basis before the European Parliament elections in 2009'. The June 2007 European Council under the German Presidency agreed on the mandate of an IGC to be called in order to amend the existing treaties. The Treaty that emerged from this process was signed in Lisbon on 13 December 2007.

The European Council becomes an institution

The Lisbon Treaty amending the existing treaties came into force on 1 December 2009. Among other things, it gives the European Council institution status, which means that it is subject to all the provisions applicable to the Union's institutions. For example, when it adopts binding legal acts, it has to comply with the legal basis provided by the Treaty and its acts can be the subject of actions before the Court of Justice. As the culmination of the process of abandoning the informal status of summits, the European Council as a new institution adopted its own rules of procedure on the day the Treaty entered into force ⁽¹¹⁾.

The Treaty also provided for a stable Presidency for the European Council, including a President elected by its members for two and a half years, renewable once ⁽¹²⁾.

Since the Lisbon Treaty came into force, the European Council, under the Presidency of Herman Van Rompuy, its first elected President, has been the source of all the major decisions the Union has taken to address international and internal challenges in the economic, financial and monetary fields, in asylum and immigration, enlargement, development cooperation and international relations. It has therefore taken on the strategic role that was assigned to it by the Maastricht Treaty and confirmed by the Lisbon Treaty in the development of the Union.

⁽¹²⁾ Of the countries that acceded to the Union in 2004 and 2007, only the Heads of State or Government of Slovenia and of the Czech Republic held the Presidency of the European Council as representatives of their Member States.
